Sternthal Books is pleased to announce the publication of Eitan Ben-Moshe's book "JERICHO MOONS." The book is the third to be released by Sternthal Books, and its publication coincides with a book launch party that will be hosted by Kunsthalle Galapagos in Brooklyn. Jericho Moons presents the semi-psychedelic world of Eitan Ben-Moshe's creations in a visionary concept: The book is a catalogue of the artist's future works, as opposed to a straight documentation of his past creations.

The images presented are interspersed with the artist's idiosyncratic poetry, providing a framework that takes the reader on a journey that moves between straight documentation of his work, and digital collages that transform his sculptures and lightboxes into new environments where they are stripped of scale and context, and freed from the constraints of their materiality. This back and forth calls into question traditional understandings of temporality, while simultaneously imagining entirely new realities.

The book brings together various of the artist's projects, including his work as a tailor, where he conducts interviews with strangers, and then offers otherworldly forms as relevant pieces of beauty for the homes of people he doesn't know. A recent project in London involved consultations with local shamans, who directed the artist towards energy breakages throughout the city, where he installed small sculptures called 'Ozone Flutes.' The project is both a symptom of distress, as well as an attempt at healing.

Ben-Moshe's work presents undefined and skeletal works that expose the things that lie underneath. He is an artist whose work straddles a borderline - exposing that which the body knows how to react to long before the mind does. Jericho Moons' also features an interview with Yael Hersonski, the award winning director of 'A Film Unfinished', as well as essays by Naomi Aviv and Lior Galili.
